Origin of Hatonosu

Early in the Edo era (1603-1868), there was a timber yard here for logs flowing from upriver, and housing for seasonal or itinerant workers.

It is said that the workers were enchanted by the sight of a pair of pigeons nesting in the forest near a shrine, above Narutaki Waterfall, dedicated to the water deity. They routinely referred to their workplace as "Pigeon's Nest", and eventually "Hatonosu" became the official name of the site.

Unfortunately, Narutaki Falls collapsed in a major flood at the end of the Edo period.

Kazuma Gorge
Kazuma Gorge is a difficult stretch to hike between Shiromaru and Hikawa, with the rock formations on the Gonzazu Ridge to traverse initially. In the mid-Edo period (starting with local efforts over many years around 1700 and then with funding from related villages), a cut was made through hard rock above where Shiromaru Tunnel now runs. A key goal was to upgrade the trade route from strictly pedestrian to practical for beasts of burden. In 1992, a more modern track was completed above the current highway and connecting Shiromaru with Unazawa.

Shiromaru Dam and fish-run
The approximately 30m high Shiromaru Dam was completed in 1963 as a regulating reservoir for the Tokyo Metropolitan Government's Tama No. 3 Power Station on Mt. Mitake. It blocked fish from migrating upstream, but the impediment was resolved in 2001 with the installation of an effective new fish-run. The system was intended to benefit sweetfish, cherry salmon and yamame trout in particular.
